Sociology studies everything that can be defined as social. This ranges from the etiquette of simple face-to-face interaction to institutions like the economy, the state, and the family. In this course students are invited to think about how so much of our social world is treated as natural, or “just the way things are”. We will begin to think about how, for example, gender behavior, social inequalities, authority, work relations, the economy, etc. are collectively achieved and defended realities and why this is the case.
